

We did it!!

We are excited to have completed a unique and collaborative initiative – a Creating Postgraduate Collaborations (CPC) joint Summer School organized by Moi, South Eastern Kenya and Maseno Universities. The three day summer school themed, "Scholarly Communities of Practice: The Future of Supervision in Africa," brought together scholars, researchers, and postgraduate supervisors to engage in stimulating discussions, knowledge-sharing, and networking.

This joint Summer School aimed to facilitate collaboration between academics, institutions, and stakeholders, fostering a culture of sharing expertise and innovative practices. By focusing on the future of supervision in Africa, the event sought to explore emerging trends, challenges, and opportunities within postgraduate mentorship. The event underscored the importance of excellence in supervision, offering participants the chance to enhance their skills and approaches for effective guidance. Through workshops, presentations, and interactive sessions, attendees engaged in critical dialogue about advancing academic mentorship within the African context.

Distinguished experts in the field delivered inspiring talks on topics ranging from innovative mentorship models to harnessing technology for effective supervision. Interactive workshops allowed participants to delve deeper into practical strategies, research methodologies, and ethical considerations within supervision while engaging panel discussions brought together diverse perspectives to address key questions and challenges in the future of supervision.

We would like to thank the European Union for making this possible. VU Amsterdam and our other consortium partners, we are grateful for the support. Together we are stronger!!
